LITERARY WOMEN WHO DRESS WELL.

Writers refute the Assertion That Literature Makes Them Careless. There was a meeting in the Woman's Press club the other day, and naturally the question of woman's dress came up. One of the ladies complained that some one else had uncomplacently said that women writers as a rule were the worst dressed women in the world! The appearance of the ladies present, however, proved that the contrary was true. There was a long discussion, of course informally, upon the subject by a few members who sat in the corner of the club room and sipped tea. A dashing little blond, who is well known on newspaper rows, took the floor first, and then surveyed her own pretty gown with a satisfied sort of air. A woman who has the face and form of a Juno declined to open conversation with the while all the others sneered at the writer of the rude paragraph, looked at themselves complacently, sipped their tea and chattered.

To be perfectly frank, however, women who make a living by their pens are, as a rule, pretty and well dressed. Take for example Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett. The author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy" has superb taste in dressing. Her gowns are original and depart in style from the conventional, but they become her, and that is the true art of dressing. I saw her once in a gown that was something between a Mother Hubbard and a Greek tunic. Not every woman could wear it, but on her it was a dream of beautiful drapery. Ella Wheeler Wilcox never wears a lady's dress, but invariably chooses herself in a loose, flowing gown, that gracefully drapes her short, plump figure. At the opera I have seen her wear a shaped corsage, cut moderately low at the neck, and looking better dressed than the wives of many millionaires in the surrounding boxes. Take Elita Proctor Otis, who is as clever a writer as she is an actress. No one has ever seen her unless she was attracted in some becoming costume. She is a remarkably handsome woman, and she is too wise, and too busy with her pen, to waste time on dress, but her gowns are the envy of all her women friends. Her dressmaker is a jewel indeed. Mrs. Clara Lanza has excellent judgment, especially in dressing. She wears exquisite dresses. Jennie June Mrs. Croly is like a queen on dress, but that may be because she has arrived at that age when a plain gown becomes her best. Laura Dainty has a highly esthetic way of costume, and herself that may look a little queer at first, but after you come to know her you get used to her innovations in dress and cannot imagine her as ever dressing differently. Mrs. Wetmore, one of the best, is noted for her modest and becoming way of dressing. She is beautiful and everything she wears has an artistic air that only enhances her good looks. Amelia Rivers Chandler is inclined to drape in flowing robes, and she knows how to dress well. Mrs. Custer, widow of the gallant Custer, is certainly neat in dress; Mrs. Ferraro, who translated Mrs. Eschschmidt's diary, has a French chic in dressing that is decidedly handsome; Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton is a double in evening attire, and Mrs. Frank Leslie White is noted for her artistic dresses.

There are few better dressed women in Grand Rapids than "Mrs. Maudie" and Jennie Miller is noted for her fine costumes. Miss Mary F. Seymour always dresses richly and in the latest fashions. Mrs. Julia Hayes Perry is almost invariably well dressed as any woman need care to be. Mrs. Fannie B. Merrill's gowns are of the material and fit perfectly. There are others, but they are too long to list, indeed—there would include Laura Giddings, Mrs. Maudie Howe Elliott, Mrs. D. W. Whitman, Mrs. Crane Jewett, Mrs. Burton Harrison, the widow of Admiral Delhagen, Miss Mary Elliott Sewell, Mrs. Alexander, Margaret Sangster, Miss Magruder, and well know too numerous to mention. The ladies here named not only dress well, but they are without exception as beautiful as they are talented. —Evening Cosmos in New York Mail and Express.

The Clothing of Babies. It is possible that women who know how to clothe their babies and little children sensibly always have them at home who those who haven't a particle of sense in this matter insist upon parading their "public places" in the name of the Listener that is the case. The majority of little children that one sees upon the street are either overclothed or underclothed. Sometimes one meets the two extremes close together. Saturday, at a railroad station, the Listener saw a half way elderly woman, who looked as if she possessed of a child, were a new thing to her, who had in her lap a tiny baby not more than two months old. The child was weighed down with a flannel skirt deeply embroidered, a white skirt heavily trimmed and tucked, a little dress with lace and tucks, all a yard or more, and over her head a long cloak and cape, both embroidered. The effect of the baby's tiny head, about as big as an apple, projecting from this great mass and length of drapery, would have been irresistibly comical if it had not been for the thought of the suffering burden that the poor baby was under. Close by, in the lap of another woman, was the antithesis of this arrangement. It was a baby in short clothes scantily clad, its short stockings, and its bare legs were blue with cold. There was no sign that it was insufficiently clad from poverty. In the few days the Listener has seen women who wear fur capes leading little girls dressed in thin white dresses. —Boston Transcript.

The Revival of the Tea Gown. There is evidence of a return to popularity of the tea gown. So long as the tea gown is confined to the uses of its existence it is comfortable, suitable and effective. When it aspires to the dignity of a dinner costume, however, or descends to the negligence of a morning wrapper, it is immediately out of place; it is too fine for the latter and too formal for the former. After its introduction in London drawing rooms a few years ago as an easy toilet and for evening dining, it soon flamed its dainty tresses on this side of the Atlantic. On American soil it began under various titles to assist at receptions, dinners, and dinners. Everybody had a tea gown. Four cent chalice ones were worn with fur capes in the tenements and costly imported muscels actually graced (C) ballrooms. Naturally the reaction came in due time. Last year the most severely simple close fitting gowns were worn by 'at home' days were a marked feature of such functions. The tea gown was put so resolutely aside that it was not even tolerated. Out of this flood and ebb, however, we are to have tea gowns to be used as such, but we are not to have tea gowns in the combination role to be worn at any time. —Her Point of View in New York Times.

Cats' Tails for Bonnet Decoration. There is the social procession on upper Broadway were recently overwhelmed at the sight of a procession of a bonnet worn by a demure little blond who had the appearance of an embarrassed child at the amount of attention she was attracting. In every particular but one the bonnet was a regulation article that got out of the way of the woman who had passed by without deeming it especially worth of attention. But hanging over the front lap, and held around under a small bunch of violets, was a cat's tail. There was no mistaking the nature of the article, for, if hung, a sinister reminder of the direful deed committed at midnight by a bookjacker in the hands of an irate man whose slumbers had perhaps been awakened by the peculiar light of the night marauder. A man was moved by the sight of this strange bit of ornamentation to inquire of one of New York's most fashionable milliners if the reigning decorations for women's head covering during the winter would be felicitous cat appendages. The milliner, giving my indication of surprise, replied in the affirmative. She said that in London and Paris the demand for cat tails to be used for ornamental purposes is spreading to an alarming extent. Most of the recent importations of bonnets have a cat's tail or a bunch of violets, and some conspicuous places. It therefore behooves the native feline to do less mauling after nightfall. With a cat's tail value placed upon each tail the small boy will be actuated by a more commendable motive than amusement in displaying of his feline. —New York Mail and Express.

The Money Question in Sorosis. Sorosis is divided into opposing factions now concerning the financial affairs of the club. Sorosis was founded as an intellectual and social organization, and the original members signs of decadence in the fact that the married element has crept in and is making its way to the front. The most marked expression of this is the recent removal of the club from the banking hall to the Lyceum, which has been gratifyingly at their service for nearly a quarter of a century, to the new factory ballroom, where each meeting will be held at an expense of $100. The factions meet at the coming business session upon the question of doubling the entrance fee and the yearly dues as well as the reduction of the element, comprising the most valuable women of the club, are opposed to the new measure on the ground that money had been made the test of membership, and that the increase in fees will exclude the very women most desirable and valuable as members, as unfortunately money and brains are in most cases hopelessly divorced. —New York Sun.

Buttons for Ornaments. The tailors and modistes are using very large buttons, but often the ornaments themselves of fastenings. A tight fitting basque bodice of rich green cloth is cut from the neck to far below the hips in one length. On each side of the invisible double breast opening are seven very large buttons, six on each side. The buttons are green, and the cuffs, collar, and deep lap pockets are green and gold brocade. Among the new buttons are those showing copies of old coins of Henry VII, Queen Elizabeth and William the Conqueror's day. There are also reproductions of old Paris gold medals and medallions in copper amalgam and mixed gold and bronze; also St. Nicholas pinks are cut on Paris buttons designed for Louis XVI coat buttons and gold buttons are of all effect and are used with garnitures, to which they correspond. The buttons given at the Savoy hotel have their counterparts of color shaded buttons made of bronze metal. —New York Post.

Seventy Years Old and Still Acting. There are some remarkable and charming old ladies on the stage, and not the least among them is Mrs. W. G. Gilbert, whose seventieth birthday was celebrated in London a few days ago by a notable dinner given at the Savoy hotel. Some thirty persons were present, including the venerable Mrs. Keeley, who has seen four score years and ten; Mrs. Mellon, who is Mrs. Woodgate, was toast among the admirers of the stage of a generation now passed away. Mrs. Woodgate, Mrs. Lamborne, Ada Rehan and Genevieve Wilton represent Mrs. Gilbert's sisters of the stage. Mrs. Gilbert was a daughter of Hart Colburn, who was the editor of the London Morning Post, and when he lost his fortune she learned to dance as a ballerina, Paul Taghgart being her instructor. She came to this country with her husband in 1840, but it was not until 1857 that she took to acting in speaking parts. Her New York debut was made under the management of Mrs. John Wood, who is now managing the Court theater in London, and is herself a remarkable old lady. —San Francisco Argonaut.

Pretty Decoration at a Fair. The season of fairs and bazaars is upon us. A beautiful church fair held last week had the still in palace shape. The tops were burnished gold; they were open all around and beautifully festooned with chrysanthemum and autumn, each one taking a different color. The effect was very handsome. A second fair had for a centerpiece in the circular hall a Maypole with white ribbons, and from the silvered top long wispils of white chrysanthemum wreathed with autumn, radiated, to all the booths, which, in a large circle, went around the hall. Shorter lengths reached to the circling table directly about the pole, which, all white and green, was tended by six young girls dressed in white and green and smiling bonbons and flowers. The other booths took different combinations of blue and silver, for the sale of dolls being much admired. —New York Letter.

A Daughter of the Revolution. Mrs. Flora Adams Darling, head of the new Daughters of the Revolution, is a slight, blond woman, who is always little under the widow's veil she always wears, and whose deafness causes her to be a great deal of the time. She dresses her that looks very gracious and is always flattering till one finds out its reason. She is the widow of a Confederate general and has published a volume of her war experience, containing an account of the battle of Chickamauga, which account General Grant considers the most correct of the war. She has been for years a successful newspaper woman. Her niece, Florence Adams, is the youngest daughter of the Revolution and has on more than one occasion read her aunt's addresses to the assembled chapters. —New York Press.

Good Health of the Queen. The queen, it is said, has not been in such good health for years—in fact, according to one more or less high authority, one of the ladies at court expects her "to be as girlish as the youngest of us." It is not, however, known how long the "youngest of us" may be, but in the interest which her majesty has lately taken in dramatic entertainments is, perhaps, a renewal of her youth. It is just possible that, in spite of her arduousness of London, she may yet appear in the royal box at the Lyceum or the Haymarket theater and give us the sunny side of eighty. —London Figaro.

A New Idea in Fancy Work. A new idea in the way of fancy work is to have patterns stamped solely in white ink colors. This is very pretty in white linen, and gives a greater effect for very little work, as the outlines only require to be embroidered. A running ribbon pattern in the same shade, is a charming one. The fast days are a new invention, and will without doubt become popular. —New York Tribune.

A Ribbon Harness. An English notion of the moment is to tie a six inch sash ribbon just over the waist, crossing it at the back and bringing it around to the front just below the bust, to form the behind in a flat bow between the shoulders and fall. The long ends to the hem of the dress. Of course this harness arrangement is used to replace the untrimmings bodice and skirt. Sometimes the ribbons have leather fringes at the ends. They should be of stiff stuff. —Exchange.

National Costumes Going. An English journal mentions the fact that "picturesque national costumes" are being worn away from the world. Some of the Swiss cantons, the Norwegian peasantry and certain districts in Russia seem to be the chief strongholds of traditional costume. In the Roumanian, the Venetian flower girl, even the graceful gondolier having imbibed a taste for fashion plate effects.

Much persuasion has been brought to bear on Miss Sophie G. Hayden, who drew the successful design for the Woman's building at the World's fair, to induce her to remain in charge, but she is too fully engaged in her present work, and she is a promising young woman and has a most promising future as an architect.

At a recent dinner the centerpiece was an old shaped bed lined with white plush, in whose loose folds the water lilies were concealed. White roses, a wreathing emerald filled and fell out of the basket, wandering in studied carelessness over the cloth.

Freuden Jager, the daughter of the German gentleman of that name, who is known as the "apple of war" because of her recent wedding a complete hair of costume of wool. Even the veil was of finely woven and sheer wool fiber. A woman in Portsmouth was being teaching navigation to the youth of the town, who she fully that many of her pupils have successfully passed the hours of trade examinations and obtained certificates as mates and skippers.

THE PEOPLE'S COLUMN.

More of the People's Column.
EDWIN MORNING PRESS—"Jon Smith" in THE MORNING PRESS—"Jon Smith" talks about silver being demonetized by the policy of the government purchasing silver and coining it in limited quantities, and about free coinage "expanding the value of silver money." If "Jon Smith" knows anything about the silver question, it seems that he would know that the silver dollars now being coined or the certificates issued in lieu thereof are not demonetized but are a full legal tender as much as any silver money ever was under free coinage, and as money it is worth just as much now as it would be if we had free coinage. And if silver should get so much cheaper, or the amount of silver in a dollar should be diminished so much that it would not sell for more than 25 or even 10 cents, it would not diminish the money value of the dollar itself, or of the certificate or note issued in lieu of it, or anything.

At present so many countries have a single gold standard that the gold in a dollar coin probably will not be bought for much if any less than a dollar, even if we had no free coinage of gold, and therefore the free coinage of gold by our government probably does not benefit the owners of gold mines much if any. But then let him advocate placing a protective duty on silver bullion.

The government is engaged in one of those unprotected industries (mason work). But he does not envy the tariff protected industries in the least. For there is not one of them in the whole United States that is or can be made to more free from foreign competition than the industry he is engaged in.

Now if those who think that foreign immigration is so injurious to home labor should say stick to the tariff, but restrict immigration there would be some sense in it, if not very humane, but most of those who make the outcry against foreign laborers coming here advocate flooding this country with, not cheap prison labor goods, but cheap foreign labor products.

When foreign laborers come here but foreign goods are excluded, then the mine those foreign laborers place their feet on American soil they necessarily become the patrons of American labor, and the more ready and remunerative employment they find here when they come, the better customers they become for American labor direct or for its products. And if we only have such as the land and currency systems so arranged as to develop our own resources to their fullest extent, and thus create the largest possible demand for labor, we can all prosper here together in spite of the extensive immigration. But when we allow our markets to be flooded with a class of goods from foreign countries that we have the facilities for producing ourselves, then the foreigners who produce those goods are not at all sure to patronize us in return, for they will simply buy what goods they want where they can buy them the cheapest.

Cast aside your "hogwash story," Jon Smith, and substitute logical arguments that is both more honorable and more educating.
 H. LUTEN.

TWAS ANOTHER CONCERN.
 The Royal Ark Instead of the Royal Arcanum.
 Editor Morning Press, Grand Rapids, Mich.
 I have been shown a copy of your paper of Nov. 12. The indictment referred to was against the officers of the Royal Ark, a short term beneficiary order, whose certificate holders had been proceeding the officers for alleged malfeasance. The Associated Press agent assures me that the dispatch was sent all right, but that in transmission it was changed by the telegraph operators and newspaper editors to Royal Arcanum.

The Royal Arcanum continues to do business at the old stand, but it is not a speculative concern, but is a purely fraternal beneficiary society. If you want any information on the subject write to Bro. Frank Mills, Esq., of Port Huron, Mich.

The Associated Press agent at Boston sent a dispatch correcting the impression which he had obtained in regard to the Royal Arcanum. Yours respectfully,

THE BALANCE OF POWER.

John Burns sees in Sir Harry Parkes' defeat a live issue for Labor in Wales.
 British workmen are naturally jubilant over the downfall of Sir Harry Parkes, prime minister of New South Wales. His defeat was brought about by the opposition of the Workmen's party in parliament, and he was opposed because of his antagonism to the eight hour provision in the government bill regulating the mining laws. The eight hour day is a live issue with the organized workers of England, and the victory of the party in New South Wales may bring matters to a head in a very short time. A recent cablegram from London has the following on the subject:

The leaders of organized labor in England are watching with keenest interest the crisis which has been brought about in the New South Wales government by the defeat of Parkes' ministry on the eight hour question. The event forms the subject matter of discussion in all the meetings of workmen, and its effect is plainly perceptible in the strengthening of the movement for independent political action on the part of the labor party in the house of commons, composed of genuine workmen and acting outside of regular political organizations, it is rapidly gaining favor. It is proposed to have the labor members isolate themselves and act absolutely as a unit in the way that the Irish party learned to do under Parnell, winning a concession for every vote that they may give for a measure of either of the regular parties. It is believed by several of the leaders of the unions that the labor party could in a few years gain many valuable points in its policy, as there are frequent occasions in almost every session of parliament when the division on certain measures is so close that a ministry will be glad to purchase the support of a small, compact, independent party at the price of considerable concessions.

John Burns is one of the most enthusiastic of the independent party advocates, and it is largely due to his untiring and intelligent efforts in its exposition that the idea has become so well understood and accepted among the workmen. In an interview with Burns he declared with evident delight that the vote in the New South Wales parliament was one of the greatest victories of labor in the history of the world. It would not only do wonders for the cause in Australia, but its effect would be strongly felt in England and America. Workers would now be enabled to see the mighty power they possessed if they would but unite and act intelligently. They would perceive that by pursuing the tactics used in Australia they could practically control any government. A new era in the history of legislation was now at hand.

place matters, who give a theoretical assent to its necessity, but do little to bring it into operation. Labor should make itself a direct, not an indirect, political factor and power.
 To Fight Convict Labor.
 The Anti-Convict Convict Labor League has been incorporated at Springfield, Ill., with George Schilling, J. J. Woodman and William Henry as incorporators. Mr. Schilling says on the subject: "We have incorporated so as to demand in the regular legal way the enforcement of the constitutional provisions against this contract convict labor system. The following tracts in Chicago, and of whom come in direct competition with this convict labor, are with us: tanners, cooper, stonemasons, both journeymen and employers; shoemakers of all branches, marble workers, including the cutters, polishers, rubbers and other lines of trade; harness makers and rattan and willow workers. As soon as we are ready for the fight we will take the newspapers into our confidence. Our object is briefly to place this contract convict labor system on a more humane, equitable and scientific basis."

The Farmer's Alliance.
 In the November elections the farmers of the country did not show the strength that the polls which they manifested as a new political force a year ago. Many reasons have been and will yet be assigned for this apparent falling off. Senator John Morgan at a November Forum, seemed to foreshadow the result which he had to misapplied confidence in political leaders. Others say the slump is due to the realization of the absurdity of the Ocala wild cat platform, and still others claim that the year's heavy crops and consequent crop failures have kept the farmer never kicks when his crib is full. You pay your money and take your choice.
