Abstract	The Grand Rapids (Mich.) City Welfare Department operated a public works relief program from 1929 to 1932. It provided work for unemployed men and some women, as well as housing for single unemployed men in the Grand Rapids and Kent County area. This collection consists of approximately 110 photographs depicting various projects undertaken by the workers, such as parks improvements, road construction, sewer and water main projects. The photographs present a vivid depiction of local municipal welfare activities during the Great Depression (1929-1932), prior to any such federal action. Established by City Manager (later Mayor) George Welsh, the program won both he and Grand Rapids national recognition.

Biographical/Historical note

In 1929, Grand Rapids City Manager George Welsh ordered the City Welfare Department to establish a public works relief program for the poor of the city and county. This program assisted both depression era families, along with the chronically poor. It won for Grand Rapids, as well as for Welsh, national recognition, though it was not without problems.

It is reported in "The Story of Grand Rapids," edited by Z.Z. Lydens, that some 20,000 men, women and children were cared for through the Scrip program, with as many as 60 projects underway at the same time.

To raise funds to pay for the project, the city bonded itself and borrowed from banks. Other fund raising was done and buildings, as well as real material goods, were supplied by Kent County and Grand Rapids businesses and individuals.

Pay was earned at a rate equivalent to up to fifty cents per hour, depending upon family size, and was issued in city scrip certificates. The scrip was redeemable at the City Scrip Store for food, clothing and other supplies. These items were said to be priced comparably to prices in other retail establishments.

The program undertook a number of public works improvements projects such as parks improvements, road construction, snow removal, firewood collection, shoe and clothing repair and distribution and food preservation and distribution. At its peak the program was employing up to 600 people, primarily men, but also some women.

Some of the photos here show the new Civic Auditorium in construction, where Scrip Labor workers were used to reclaim building materials from the cleared building site. The building was later called the Welsh Auditorium.

The program came under criticism for several reasons. The most outstanding complaint was that the program was being operated outside of the mandated city business procedures. Also, local merchants felt the scrip store presented unfair competition, since it accepted scrip instead of legal tender. Finally, the program also provided a shelter for homeless single men, whom many people felt were not as needy as unemployed married men. In spite of these criticisms, the program continued until it was supplanted by the much larger Federal Works Progress Administration.

Scope and Contents note

The collection contains approximately 500 photos of various projects undertaken by the program, such as parks improvements, road construction, sewer and water main projects, food preservation and distribution and two drives to raise food at Thanksgiving ("Fill the Barrel") and Toys at Christmas ("For an Empty Stocking"). The photos present a vivid depiction of local municipal welfare activities during the Great Depression, prior to any such federal action.

Most of these photo prints are 8x10, with two sets of old numbers on the back. A set of handwritten descriptions is usually found at the top, including the numbers used in the descriptions below. Another set of "PBD" or "OBD" numbers was probably from early library file processing.

While this is basically a photo collection, ancillary documents are now being appended which are associated with the images, such as the "City Social Service Grocery Order" form, which would have been used by those making requests from the various food stores depicted in the photos.
